What Is Daylight Saving Time, Anyway?

Daylight saving time ends for most of the U.S. on November 1. But why do we change our clocks by one hour in the spring in the first place? "In the early 19th century ... localities set their own time," said Bill Mosley, a public affairs officer at the U.S. Department of Transportation. There was no standardized time until train travel became common. The U.S. railroad industry established time zones with standard times in 1883, and Congress made the railroad's system a law in 1918. The next year, the decision of whether or not to observe daylight saving time was left up to individual jurisdictions.

Some places, like American Samoa, Hawaii and most of Arizona, don't mess with Father Time. For those places that do observe it, though, the law says that people must set their clocks back to standard time at 2:00 a.m. on the first Sunday in November. This Sunday, the sun will set an hour earlier. The switch to daylight saving time again on the second Sunday in March "adjust[s] daylight hours to when most people are awake and about," Mosley said. During daylight saving time months, there's less light in the morning and more light in the evening. Although more light in the evening isn't helpful to everyone (like farmers), research shows that longer daylight hours decrease traffic accidents and crimes.

When updating legislation in the 1980s, Congress noted that daylight saving time has many benefits, including "more daylight outdoor playtime for the children and youth of our Nation." -National Geographic for Kids <http://goo.gl/qPdSiL>

To Know.

It's an error to assume that because we believe or don't believe something, it changes reality. Some may not believe in gravity, and they even may feel they have "evidence" to back up their belief. However, gravity exists whether they believe in it or not--and God is knowable whether we believe it or not. Jesus testified, "And this is life eternal, that they might know you the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom you have sent" (John 17:3).

We not only have the testimony of the Scriptures to tell us this, but we have the testimony of multitudes of Christians who know the Lord personally. It is more truthful to say, "I don't want to know God." Sinful man runs from Him as did Adam in the Garden of Eden.
