-Common Sand Dollar, Created on Day 5

Small but numerous spines of the common sand dollar are its primary tool for burrowing within the upper few centimeters of sandy ocean bottoms. Other specialized spines hold sand and debris aloft while food particles are ingested.

The sand dollar's test, or skeleton, is round and disc-like, and is covered with deep reddish-purple spines. The sand dollar loses its purple color when it is washed ashore.

As with other sand dollars, the common sand dollar has five petal-like furrows or pores on its test. These are used to move sea water into its internal water-vascular system, which allows for movement.

Fun Facts

Its shell is actually called a "test" since it is not a true shell.

The common sand dollar buries itself in the sand for food and protection.

The best time to collect sand dollars on the beach is after a heavy storm.

Normality

I was excited today when an ostrich egg I ordered arrived in the mail (I have always wanted one). I immediately put it into the chicken coop and watched how the chickens reacted to it. Even chickens know that an ostrich egg in with their eggs isn't normal.

As human beings we find a sense of security in normality. The sun rises each morning, the seasons come around each year, birds sing, grass grows, water is wet, clouds drop rain, and a million and one others things that make up this thing we call "life."

But the time is coming when God will make all things new, where nothing will be normal as we now know it, where there will be no more disease, dishonestly, disappointments, death, dandruff, or dentists. Come quickly Lord Jesus.
