Singing Mice and Scientific Breakthroughs
-Kids Answers Website

Have you ever heard a mouse sing? Some mice in Costa Rica can produce a song very similar to that of birds, only the mice are monotonal (using only one tone). These mice, called Scotinomys teguina, communicate in a series of chirps, sometimes chirping as fast as 20 times per second!

The mice chirp because of a gene called FOXP2. People also have a version of the FOXP2 gene in their genetic code. Even a small mutation—a change in genetic information—in the human FOXP2 gene can cause problems such as autism and speech disorders. Scientists have decided to study the FOXP2 gene in singing mice to see if they can discover why these disorders occur in people. Maybe they can find a cure!

The singing mouse Scotinomys teguina chirps up to 20 times per second. Both males and females chirp, though males chirp more. Their song may seem like birdsong to humans, but the mouse song is usually composed of only one note.

"Often we see "evolution" get credit for medical breakthroughs, but if Phelps [the scientist leading the study] learns something from singing mice applicable, for instance, to autism, it will not be a proof of the importance of evolutionary belief—as we so often hear—but rather a deciphering of the genetically designed similarities that bears fruit. Our common Designer naturally uses many common designs, from genes to anatomical structures, to perform similar functions in different kinds of animals and people. 1 – Dr. Elizabeth Mitchell"

PAID IN FULL

I was waiting for the news recently and watched an advertisement for a well-known insurance company. They claimed that if you claimed on your new written-off car, they would underwrite it completely. Sure. I was skeptical and froze the TV on the fine print. The offer was subject to the age of the car, its mileage, its ownership, it wasn't available in certain states and was also subject to an "applicable deductible" and to "terms and conditions" of their "underwriting guidelines." To qualify for a claim, you must maintain an accident-free record for five years. Additionally, the customer must not have received any driving violation in three years. There's no fine print for God's offer of everlasting life. The headlines are big and bold: "For the wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Romans 6:23)... "For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved" (Romans 10:13). And the premium was paid in full 2,000 years ago. Ray Comfort <http://tinyurl.com/l9scu2k>
